Visual Privacy Issues in Housing Design
“Between the Islamic Legislation & Building Codes”

This dissertation discusses the right to safety and the effect of its absence on human beings' psychological states. More specifically, the study focuses on the right to optical safety in dwellings in Islamic communities, especially because it is closely connected with the Islamic necessity of the veil (hijab). The study aims to prove that ensuring optical safety in dwelling is a basic human need in general, and in Islamic communities in particular. It also proves that human-made construction laws ignore the right of optical safety in the context of Arab and Islamic cities. Third, it proves that the absence of optical safety in a dwelling negatively correlates with the health and psychological states of human beings. While existing specifications in many communities require that human beings have the right to have adequate access to lighting and ventilation, they ignore their right in following the teachings of Islamic sharia. The study is divided into three key themes: designing the interior space of buildings, the architectural design of the exterior, and the effect of the absence of optical safety on human beings' health. The study adopted a descriptive, analytic approach from the perspective of human rights and through analyzing various dwelling models and field studies. The study concludes that optical safety has a positive effect on human beings' social and psychological states. It is also necessary for interior and exterior designers to interact with one another in order to meet the inhabitant's optical safety.
